If you're looking for blog posts that will persuade readers to take an action, such as sign up for a newsletter, you should include clear calls-to-action (CTAs) near the end of each paragraph. However, if you're writing an informative blog post that doesn't seek any action from the reader, such as "How to Make Kale Chips," use links in your text to make it easy for readers who want more information on this topic. For example: "For more info on how to make kale chips with nutritional yeast and red pepper flakes, click here." Many blog posts make the mistake of using an infinitive. Instead of writing "readers should read the next paragraph" or "readers should click here to read the next paragraph," use active verbs like "read, click, hover" (and other verbs that show the reader what he or she is to do). For example: "Read how to make kale chips with nutritional yeast and red pepper flakes. Click here to see the recipe." What is a myth about building a successful blog? There are no short cuts. A blog is just like any other major undertaking—it takes planning, time, and effort. And it requires patience because it can take six months to a year for traffic to pick up. What's the best way to start blogging? If you're just starting out, don't worry about what to blog about. Keep it simple. Start with topics that interest you and your friends, or curate content on a subject that gets people talking (such as "Why Are Millennials Killing _____?" where readers fill in the blank). Once you build an audience, find your voice and react to your readers' comments by writing more posts on topics they're interested in. It's also helpful to join an online blog community where you can meet bloggers who are already established in your niche, follow their blogs, and get inspired by what they write. Joining an online community is a great way to start blogging because it provides motivation, motivation, and accountability. Check out this article on how to find a blog community. How can someone learn about blogging after college? This all depends on your background. There is no "standard" way to learn about blogging—some people enroll in courses or attend conferences while others just start writing posts. Another great way to learn is to take a look at other bloggers' websites and see what they do. For example, if you visit the blog for "The Kitchn," you'll see that it's organized into sections like "Recipes, The Table" and "Our Story" that tell you how the site functions. The Pinterest page for the same website is organized around different boards (such as One Pot Dinners or Vegetable Recipes) so readers can easily find recipes they want to try. What are some blogging resources? Wordpress is one of the best blogging platforms because it's so widely used so there are plenty of tutorials online for beginners.
